

An Address Before the Philomathean Society of the University of Pennsylvania (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from An Address Before the Philomathean Society of the University of Pennsylvania It was a happy inspiration which first suggested the delivery of these addresses. Happy it must be for you thus to be assured of sympathy from your elder brothers in study, and happy, I am sure, for us, who, covered with the dust of crowded thoroughfares, and worn with the burdens of public duty, are permitted to separate ourselves, though but for a brief hour, from the busy people, and retire again within the cool grove of academic life. We may not be allowed to say that we envy you your fresh spirits and classic exertions, for it were unmanly and unchristian to shrink, even in thought, from the offices which God and our fellow men require at our hands, and sobriety of zeal best becomes them; but you cannot know, until you have felt it, the zest with which memory turns in after life to our growing years, and the intellectual Pal?stra, where in generous emulation we trained the sinews of our youthful minds, and warmed the courage of our hearts for the serious struggles of active manhood.
