

The Psychology of Public Speaking

INTRODUCTION The term psychology has a peculiarly formidable appearance. It is supposed to denote something mysterious and ominous and to be closely related to the black art or something of that sort. It is a study in character to note the way different people are affected by reference to the subject. The author of this series of articles spent his youth in a rural community, and attended high school and a normal school in a neighboring city. The inhabitants of the rural district knew that he intended to teach school, but had not kept posted as to what had become of him after he had left the normal school. Some ten years later he returned to his boyhood home and renewed old acquaintances. By this time he had completed his college and university work, received his degree abroad and settled down as an ordinary professor of psychology in an American university. Words can but feebly express the replies which were received from the old acquaintances when they were informed that he was a professor of psychology. His former Sunday School teacher was a dear old lady who had not lost her interest in him, and when he told her that he was teaching psychology, she threw up her hand in horror and exclaimed, What under heaven is that ? The author thought that the emphasis was on the under heaven, thus indicating that it could have nothing to do with heaven, and hence not 8 The Psychology of Public Speaking. worthy the consideration of an earnest young man. When the word psychology was uttered in answer to the question, What yer teachin now ? the old farmer exclaimed, What on earth is that ? This was a little more encouragement, for it at least seemed to imply that the farmer assumed it to occupy a place on this planet.
