Bishop Naegle takes his wife to dinner a few days early and reminisces about their marriage. Elizabeth Farnsworth is frustrated, trying to figure out how decorating Valentines boxes with her kids turned into a yelling match. Grant and Lenore, grateful for the neighbors who volunteered to babysit their kids, go to a dinner they're reluctant to share together. Peter Bodvarson introduces some little ones to the delights of an inside out peanut butter and jelly sandwich. Then he and Wendy have fun helping them spread frosting on cookies and licking it off fingers. Garrett Naegle actually has a basketball game on Valentines evening. But when emergency personnel come it's a game that no one wins. March Shawn still doesn't know what to call what happened to his son. It wasn't a heart attack but it killed his childhood. Garrett wants to avoid everyone, at home and at school, and he especially doesn't want to go to the Young Womens fundraiser. Wendy Bodvarson helps Sophia make a pie for the fundraiser, but Sophia is upset that it looks like a first attempt at pie. She feels the pie is another manifestation of her inability to find her place in her new ward. April Bishop Naegle has been spending too much time in and out of hospitals. Despite that, he's excited about the progress they've made and how well Garrett's heart is doing. He worries that Garrett may be struggling with depression and doesn't know how to help his son find new life. Lenore Palombi is worried about a possible miscarriage and about her husband who is pulling away emotionally. Is it because of pressure at work or the new baby? It's daunting to handle the stress of a challenging pregnancy with a husband who doesn't seem to care. Elizabeths divorce is final, but now her sons having problems at school. She had hoped that leaving her husband would solve problems for her family but instead she has a completely new set of challenges to deal with and sometimes she doesnt feel up to the task.
